Through Winter Storms, Teamsters Technicians at United Still Deliver

Winter storms affect regions differently. In some places, they're expected and prepared for. In others, they bring everything to a standstill.

But regardless of where they hit, there is work that still must get done. And no matter the region — or the weather — Teamsters technicians at United Airlines show up.

Even when flights are delayed or canceled and airports are quieter than usual, the work doesn't stop. Aircraft still need to be inspected, maintenance still has to be done, and safety still comes first. There may be fewer passengers making it through the terminal, but our technicians still report to work to do the job right and keep things moving.

Snow, ice, wind, or freezing temperatures don't change the responsibility — and they don't change our members' commitment to the safety of the traveling public around the world. That level of professionalism and dedication does not go unnoticed, and it deserves recognition. It deserves a fair contract.

Thank you to every mechanic who showed up, powered through, and did the job when it wasn't easy — this week and beyond.

And while many people are still staying home and out of the cold, the Teamsters National Negotiating Committee for United Airlines is in Austin, Texas, ready to get to work again on your behalf.

Negotiations officially kicked off today, and the committee received a comprehensive economic proposal from the company. The committee will be reviewing it in full and hopes to have a counterproposal prepared tomorrow.

The same dedication you all bring to work every day is being brought to the bargaining table this week and every day. Your negotiating committee is showing up prepared, focused, and ready to fight for the contract you deserve.
